INTRODUCTION

The Federal Trade Commission will respond to requests for advice from health care providers and others through its advisory opinion process.¹ On September 15, 1993, the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice jointly issued six policy statements containing “safety zones” for provider conduct that the agencies generally would not challenge under the antitrust laws. The policy statements were updated and revised on September 27, 1994, when the agencies jointly issued nine statements of antitrust enforcement policies and analytical principles regarding mergers and various joint activities in the health care area. In response to changes in the health care market, on August 28, 1996, the agencies issued revisions to statements eight and nine concerning physician network joint ventures and multi-provider networks.² The Commission will respond within 90 days to requests for advice about most matters addressed by the policy statements, and within 120 days to requests for advice regarding other non-merger health care matters.
